

It is with great sadness, I have learned of the tragic fire at Copenhagen's historic Børsen, a beacon of Danish culture and heritage. This disaster, which echoes the heartache felt during the devastation of the Notre-Dame de Paris, reminds us of the fragility of our world's historic treasures.

The Børsen has stood as a testament to Denmark's enduring spirit, encapsulating centuries of history within its walls. The loss of the iconic dragon spire, a beloved symbol of Copenhagen's skyline, is a grievous blow to Denmark and to all who cherish global cultural heritage.

I extend my deepest condolences to those directly affected by this tragedy and to all Danish citizens mourning this loss. I also commend the brave efforts of the emergency services, volunteers, and all those who risked their safety to preserve what could be saved from the flames.

In this moment of loss, the people of Kaharagia stand in solidarity with Denmark. We support your journey of recovery and restoration, confident that the resilience and unity displayed in these trying times will herald a new chapter for the Børsen, reborn from the ashes for future generations to cherish.
